Q: Avoiding script duplication with window.location redirect I'm getting error when I run this script on a site I'm working on: window.location = "" + encodeURIComponent(window.location) + ""; Error: It looks like you're using an unsupported version of Internet Explorer. For a better browsing experience, please upgrade your browser, or switch to an up-to-date version of your Internet Explorer href="">download I realize that I probably should rewrite this part of the code, but is there a convenient way to avoid the first line of script? I don't want to copy paste the first part of the script and modify it. A: Basically it won't error if you just do this, window.location = "

A while back, we saw that Tesla was displaying more and more vehicles of Model 3 at their stores, and now the company has done something pretty crazy. It is very likely that Model 3 production will be changed to "100 units per week" from "production in July 2018." This option was previously suggested when Model 3 was anticipated to start production in July 2018, but we all knew it was an estimate and we believed that the wait time would be similar to that of the Model X. For example, it took Model X between 2 and 3 months to go from production to showrooms, while the Model 3 is estimated to arrive at showrooms in September or October. We even stated that the production timeline would end up being around 45,000 vehicles per year, which is more than Model S and Model X combined. Now, it looks like they are changing the expectations and saying that they want to change it to a rate of 100 units per week. Of course, d41b202975

What's new in Super Knockoff! VS:

Real Manly Manly Cleland's Layouts and Patterns The last year or so has seen the resurgence of the menswear trope known as the Japanese fashion frontier, also known as the modern menswear movement. The resurgence has led to a lot of interesting products and articles, including the de rigeur one about the evolution of mens fashion. But one of the most interesting parts of the menswear resurgence is the rebirth of the beach plage. If you're not familiar with the emergence of the beach plage, it's where young men from different countries go to get far from everything, while wearing all black to symbolize their devotion to the uniform. The term was revived by Japan, where young men used it for their vastly visible enthusiasm for fashion and youth, but later spread globally, with nearly all nations of the world having some form of beach plage. The beach plage is an interesting phenomenon as it focuses on non-historical values. Granted, the beach plage is still an extremely ancient tradition, as can be seen from the last photo in this post, and these are from pre-modern times, but the fashion and menswear movement has typically shown that less is more with regards to design. The fashion frontier movement has though a tendency to re-enact a location's history. (P.S. While I'm not claiming in any way that Australia's menswear renaissance is a beach plage, there has definitely been a push towards fashion in the more recent decade.) The Matiz section of the beach plage, also known as the parade beat; a shiro-pop fashion. The main beach plage trends featured so far have been: Bermuda shorts Two toned casual wear A variety of Shirts (I've been covered in that article already) Simple designs Sports shoes with retro styles The style above is by designer Shunsuke Amada. Amenhotsus A popular variety is the Amenhotep headwear, which are parades of past menswear trends. A popular way to display this in fashion is through the use of mimetic color, which was long popularized by one of Japan's own fashion titans, Akira Nishikido. A mimetic color is a garment or accessory that is in fashion for a period of time, and then isn
