Conventional bubble generators or air bladders are commonly used to aerate the ambient air surrounding a person or a structure at any given point in time. Specifically, a conventional bubble generator or air bladder is a small flexible bladder used for aerating the surrounding air and producing a flow of bubbles about the person or structure. Conventional bubble generators are generally made from a clear gel that can be injected into a solution for producing the bubbles. When the solution is exposed to air, the air in the solution absorbs carbon dioxide gas which swells the fluid and expands in volume to create bubbles. These conventional bubble generators may be used in a wide variety of applications to enhance overall indoor and outdoor cleanliness and provide a source of amusement and entertainment. Generally, conventional bubble generators and air bladders are produced in
